

BMC Poli Sci Pep Talks

Megan Omolo '25

Faculty Advisor : Jeff Hopkins

Field Supervisor Joel Schlosser

★ 5.0 (Education) Political Science Studies, The Politics of Everyday, Bryn Mawr Experience

Follow

About

What comes after a Political Science Degree? Join Bryn Mawr College political Science student Megan Omolo '25 as she chats with alums, students, and professors discussing the impact of political science studies on their academic journeys and how they've applied what they learned in their careers.

► Podcast Producer

Responsibilities as Host

As Podcast Producer of BMC Poli Sci Pep Talks, I was able to combine my interest in communication and political science through this Praxis Independent Study. As host, I had complete control of inviting guests to bring onto the show, interviewing, editing, writing content, and producing a podcast that unites former and current political science students who share a passion for politics.

What I've mastered as a Podcaster

 Improved Communication Skills - Through this podcast, I've developed better communication techniques, especially when following up with guests and improvising during interviews.

 Big Picture Ideas - As a podcast producer, I've learned to envision the endless potential of expanding this show's concepts and direction. Planning for future growth and new storytelling opportunities that showcase to students the everyday intersections of politics in our lives.

 Better storytelling - As each episode progressed, I brainstormed new ways to captivate my audience with the guests featured on the show.

Featured Guest

Amy Guan '24

The comparative policy analysis skills I gained at Bryn Mawr's Poli Sci department were very important for what I do right now, and I thought it was an incredible journey

Dr. Haley Norris

I hope that anyone who studies political science feels like there's space for them in this world because there definitely is, and we need more people who are passionate and interested

Grace Curtin '24

I think political science at Bryn Mawr has really challenged me to make connections and do work on my own, without me ever feeling like I don't have the skills needed to succeed. I think that's really challenged me as a thinker.